Research Interests

I am particularly attracted by scientific challenges that span from theoretical modeling to applicative exploitations of the findings in real world scenarios. Working with many collaborators, peers, as well as younger researchers under my supervision, is my primary call. I have participated to large and complex projects, discussing with scientists active in many different disciplines, such as physics, sociology, philosophy, communication science. I believe that multidisciplinary and interdisciplinary collaborations are fundamental assets for ground breaking societal innovations.

During the earliest years of my scientific career, I have been involved in research projects focused to strictly related computer science problems, such as: computer and network security, distributed applications, peer-to-peer systems, micro-payment systems, proactive password checking, anomaly detection, machine learning, inductive logic programming, web and data mining, recommendation systems.

As data availability and the importance of data-driven knowledge have emerged powerfully also in other areas other than computer science, the potential implications of my most relevant contributions in the last decade, however, have moved also to some areas other than computer science. Many new promising fields were introduced to better gather all the useful multidisciplinary efforts, and today I am comfortable with the following categories that best fit with my research topics: 'em computational social science, complex networks, network science, network analysis, data science, social media analysis.

Science is likely built over a series of intellectual obsessions. My most recent one is misinformation spreading and polarization in on line communities.
